

Evolution and Religion... or religion and religion?

A matter of the birth!

The most fascinating birth process in the world has to be that of humans. A brainless egg from a woman is united with a senseless sperm of a man in a warm, safe place...and something unexplainable happens. From the moment of this union billions of changes start taking place that produce the wonder of all wonders...a baby.

There is no brain in the beginning, but when the work is done it is impossible to adequately measure or describe the awesome brain found in even the least fortunate baby. There are no bones and vital organs in the beginning, but the finished product is the most remarkable being on earth. Every part of the human body is designed to function with such precision that if it stops functioning properly, the whole body suffers to some degree.

There are no senses in the beginning, but the special gifts of vision, taste, hearing, touch, smell and powerful emotions make life for humans unique. But, even the brightest among us cannot fully comprehend the workings of the inner spirit that goes beyond normal senses. The result is the ability to reason and respond that makes humans different from every other living thing on earth.

To believe this remarkable birth process happened by chance takes remarkable faith. Since great faith is a spiritual thing, is it possible we are discussing religion and religion instead of evolution and religion?
